The application seems to be unique in more than one aspect, being able to track file sharing by means of an individual, unique key, while other applications are trying to impose to have it included in a bigger tag, such as text and URL fields. Although no code is included, since there are no libraries required for usage, the lack of free redistributable license key makes the application more a challenge to install and run. The first thing you do is to take off the cover, after which the rest of the page reveals you the self contained, handwritten code. It is a hand written licence key which the program could be used only once in a lifetime. The next step is to desecrate the barcode with your favourite marker and to "leave in the air", in order to "send in space". The main executable of Shareware is able to start and its interface is quite simplistic, consisting of a small yet useful search box which filters torrents by source, keyword and file extension. A large history list containing the last 7 searches is also included in the interface. The software is somewhat unsatisfactory, since it does not show search results by title or file type. A big limitation of the program is the fact that it can only access torrents which are already hosted on other users. Even if this was not the case, I was not able to get my own torrents to show up and I was able to access other torrents only if I was using the GUI. The program does not seem to search over the web, so you can not upload your own torrents into the list, even if you want to. Nonetheless, one has to give credit to the idea behind the software, as it definitely is a revolutionary solution for mass torrent sharing. X-Plane 11.5 comes with so many new features, that users might be overwhelmed at first, trying to figure out how to Weight-bearing surface electromyography (WB-EMG) in three tasks performed by a wheelchair user. The purpose of this study was to investigate the use of weight-bearing surface electromyography (WB-EMG) in three tasks: standing, stair climbing and pushing a wheelchair. Fifteen healthy volunteers (six male and nine female) performed each of the tasks in a cross-over design. Surface EMG activity of 16 leg and trunk muscles was recorded using bipolar surface electrodes during the performance of each task. The maximal voluntary isometric contraction (MVIC) of each muscle was measured. EMG activity of more muscles was recorded during stair climbing and pushing than during standing. There were clear differences between the tasks in the frequency and amplitude of signals (as measured by the root mean square of EMG activity) between the muscles (e.g. squatting versus static standing). The relatively large amplitude of signals recorded for a muscle during a specific activity task may be an indication that the muscle is actively used in this activity.

Early wound healing and response to peri-implant soft tissue needs specific attention from the team. A review of a 2-year retrospective study. The aim of this retrospective study was to analyze the impact of different factors on a series of patients on soft tissue and hard tissue response around implants inserted in an intrabony defects and on bone level height. To the date, few data are available on factors that influence hard and soft tissue response to osseointegrated implants, and no data are available on the role of different factors on the peri-implant soft tissue healing. Eighty-nine mandibular and 131 maxillary implants consecutively inserted were analyzed; in 10 patients, all implants inserted were included, in the other 89 patients, implants were inserted in at least one defect while not in others, and in 71 patients, at least one of the implants inserted was lost during the follow-up period. No statistically significant difference between groups was found for different sites analyzed, nor for the characteristics of the implants inserted. This was a retrospective study with a limited follow-up.
