British coaches will be able to gain entry to their nation's biggest tournament for the first time this summer, the Football Association (FA) has announced. From the 2018 European Championship in France, the UK's elite female footballers will be able to compete against all of Europe's top nations for a year. The plan is to stage a Women's Euros in England in 2019, with the FA's former youth coach Nicola Salerno as head of women's football. The tournament, which will be played every two years, will be broadcast on national television, with the first finals taking place at the Copper Box stadium in London, which has hosted this year's World Cup and the Euro 2016 finals. England will receive a direct qualification to the Women's Euros in 2019, with a four-team tournament to take place in Holland, Wales, Denmark and Belgium. Each team will play each other once in the four-team group stage. The finalists will then compete for the World Cup, with all games being live on the BBC. England won the previous title in 2017. The men's tournament will also move to England, with the 18 teams in the finals being divided into three groups of six. The top three nations in each group qualify directly for the semi-finals, while the second- and third-placed nations go through to the last-16. England's men have not qualified for a major tournament for almost a decade and lost their last major tournament final in 2006. They have never even reached the World Cup knockout stages. "This is an opportunity for us to showcase the best of British football in a one-stop shop. It's about using our sports academies to their maximum potential," said a FA spokesperson. "We want the best female footballers in the country playing against the best nations in the world, so the question for me is when can we think about it?" said Salerno. "We are in the midst of a real golden era for football and we are incredibly proud to be able to take this next step forward, and so soon after World Cup," added FA chief executive Martin Glenn./# * Module: semaphore.h * * Purpose: * Implementation of POSIX semaphores. * * Limitations: *
