Read on for an interview with game director Matt Prior and producer Peter de Vlugt to see how they say the integration of real-life player data and motion capture technology has led to the game's cutting-edge techniques and innovation. [CLICK HERE TO DOWNLOAD THE MP3] Football is one of the most complex sports to simulate in video games. What are your thoughts on the process of bringing an actual football match to a video game? Matt Prior: That's a great question. That was one of the things we had to consider when we were thinking about the next iteration of the series, and it was definitely one of the main sources of research that we needed to do. The fact that we're not just mimicking the physicality of a football match, but we're actually going out there and capturing the data from the players themselves was a really important component of this. I think that's the most important thing that's important for us to actually know about football and the game, is to know, not what the rules are, but to know what the rules actually mean. So, if we start from a complete and true understanding of what those rules are, and how that relates to us, then we're going to be able to make a really, really good football match. How did you go about defining how you wanted to capture and then present this data to players? Matt Prior: When we were thinking about what the capture data would look like, we really wanted to make sure that we knew what we wanted to capture. So, when we started thinking about it, we decided that we wanted to make sure that we captured all of the actions we wanted to capture. The first thing was tackling, whether it was a physical tackle or if it was through the ball, so we wanted to make sure that we captured that. We also wanted to make sure that we captured all of the actions that are on the ball and in the air, we wanted to make sure that we captured all of that. Then we went one step further than that. We wanted to capture and simulate not just the physical actions on the ball, but how the players would react, the kind of positions they were in and how they would then relate to the defensive players. For example, if we were to then define a goal kick, and we wanted to simulate the goalkeeper making a save, and
