Uptake of xanthurenic acid by blood mononuclear cells in human subjects following ingestion of beef and pork. Xanthurenic acid (XA), a tryptophan metabolite, has been detected in the plasma, urine and feces of man. We quantitated plasma XA concentrations using high pressure liquid chromatography (HPLC). Seventeen volunteers were provided two steaks of beef and pork. One steak was cooked and the other raw. Uptake of XA by blood mononuclear cells (BMC) isolated from the raw beef-fed group was significantly greater than that of the cooked beef and pork-fed groups. The values for XA uptake by BMC were 5.18 +/- 1.44 ng/10(6) cells, 4.11 +/- 1.61 ng/10(6) cells and 1.99 +/- 0.32 ng/10(6) cells for cooked beef, raw beef and pork, respectively. This effect is consistent with upregulation of P2X7 receptors in the blood mononuclear cells in response to the food-borne macromolecules containing XA. Furthermore, the strong association of XA with beef was also evident in the blood serum of the raw beef-fed subjects. Using the relative retention time (RR) of XA, the combined HPLC method was validated and a limit of detection of 1.3 ng/ml and 3.0 ng/ml was obtained for serum and plasma, respectively.
