In the early 19th century, when the mariner's compass was invented, the compass was checked for accuracy by measuring its deviation from the magnetic south Pole. The compass was only accurate between the magnetic north Pole and the magnetic South Pole. A first systematic improvement was introduced by Lord Kelvin in 1846 when he invented the concept of the magnetic zone. In his book The Kelvin Lectures on Electricity and Magnetism (1869), published in the year of Kelvin's death, F. W. Baily showed that the maximum error in north magnetic latitude for compasses using a sector of angle arcs was less than 0.5% for a maximum magnetic latitude of 85 degrees. An instrument was developed in 1854 in the Navy Hydrographic Office (NHO) by Samuel Holland and John James Audubon in Saint Petersburg, Russia, to measure the declination. This instrument consisted of a magnetic compass with the horizontal base aligned with the axis of the earth and a horizontal graduated arc with the perpendicular of the base intersecting the axis of the earth. The instrument was connected to a star board of the SRG (Stereographic Survey of Great Britain) that was placed close to the pole and used for measuring terrestrial magnetism with the aid of a sextant. By 1858, instrumentation was so advanced that a personal compass could determine north within 0.01 degree. As the instrumentation improved, the minimum measuring accuracy was also improved. Instruments were introduced in the late 1800s that allowed for the measurement of magnetic north within a minimum of 0.001 degree.

Uber is hiring outside of its normal recruitment ways, but in a very efficient way. Via a job listing, the company is looking for 'The People Manager'. However, they aren't looking for that person to manage the team (of about 15) who manage customer service, handling push notifications, handling policy violations, etc. Instead, they want the person to be the 'magic' glue between the two teams. We got in touch with Uber to find out more about this role and they explained that there are a few requirements for the successful applicant. First off, a candidate will have to have great communication skills. Uber has a 'stop asking questions' policy, but when pushed for a reason behind that, Uber said that it's because "we want someone to be able to transmit anything and have it work". It's about being able to "communicate fully and effectively at all levels". For example, if a driver is responding to an upset customer, the People Manager would need to "actively listen and respond effectively". This is something that the candidate will be trained on but they will need to know how to talk to all members of the team. Finally, a candidate will need to be an 'integrator'. They will be the "point-person". They will oversee the conversations, ensure that everyone is working together, and communicate how the teams are working together. We got in touch with a few candidates to find out if they'd be interested in this role. As it's obviously a brand new role, they've been only taking applications for a week or so. So who are our top 3? This is the world's smallest camera. Michael Gonzales Michael has years of experience in software development, and was looking for
