The debates about t-shirt and other uniform rights are simply a modern spin on the old "Not A Cool Thing" which was the original way to enforce arbitrary and spontaneous decisions about what to wear. The loser gets branded with a question mark. I have an example of this theory in action: [If you don't conform, you become the equivalent of a pirate. "Oh, you've found my secret hiding place. Are you sure you want to see my treasure?" ~~~ michaelwww If you are a pirate, you are at least doing something. Where's the fun in wearing stuff you don't like? ~~~ pbrunet That's not how life works. You can also learn skills and have fun doing it. ~~~ mgkimsal perhaps I was being too literal, but yes 0cc13bf012

I'm very pleased to introduce you to our new feature: Maker. One of the most powerful aspects of stage design is the playwright's willingness to turn over their work to the audience for the creation of a work that can last, last a lifetime. It's this attitude that shines through the examples given in our series. I'd like to give you a glimpse into the creative process of making a new stage work. In December 2010 an invitation was sent to new playwrights from all over the US to submit a play for a truly unique performance and mentorship experience. The idea was to allow new playwrights to collaborate with established designers and performers to create a truly unique event in the middle of Chicago's streets, making the power of theatre experience feel like a group effort. The stage was designed in partnership with the Chicago community and William Morris Endeavor. The process was fascinating and incredibly rewarding. It began with an incredible resource: a call for submissions. The intention was that all the submissions would be paired with designers to create a unique design experience for each playwright. When the 100 plays were narrowed down to the final 20, the following design process was put in place
