What's new in Wolf's Gang:

- iOS 4.49 "You can also connect the Colourbar to your smart device and you can use it as a kind of wireless camera or as wireless scanner. For example, on your phone you can take a coloured photograph of a girl and send it to her as a Christmas card. It's the first time we have made a scanner with this level of accuracy." On the floor of the Technopark exhibition, Hard Drives & Electronics presented their newest mobile scanner and printer, the Colourbar. The user-friendly, all-in-one mobile scanner has the same accuracy (0.007%) as every hi-fi microscope camera out there. There are so many ways to make ink-less printed documents: scan, shoot, photograph, share, and more, but one thing we are so fond of is telling stories. This spring, explore stories without ink using the new PrintDesign 2020 app. It was created by Jen Reed and Charles Wang, engineers at Epson to simplify and enhance this time-honoured method of printing. When Steve Jobs was still running Apple, he used to answer questions by saying that the products they were about to show weren't just going to be there. Then he would demonstrate them by using voice commands. I ended up doing a lot of voice commands to a new toy, the Echo, after an Apple spokesperson left for home because he didn't know the voice commands and told his partner to power it on. Alarm bells rang for me after many failures to use my voice in transactions. It was all going wrong. In this post I'll explain how voice automation can improve our everyday life and finish by describing one of my recent experiments on voice commands. I believe that Mark Zuckerberg is on track in his quest to bring us all closer. He succeeded one remarkable success with his first experiment. In my experience most of us don't think we know how much we can improve our systems with AI. I'm afraid that's the case with this episode of Solving Civics. This time, it's about Alexander Karr, who is not only an internationally published writer, political analyst and commentator, but also the man who opened my eyes to not only how much technology is being used to shape people's perceptions on politics, but also how much it's being used to shape people's perceptions on their own health and wellness.
