I am currently learning how to design a servo amplifier circuit with a microcontroller as a user. I learned how to do this a long time ago but I forget most of it. One of the things I have always been unclear with is the reason why we negative and ignore input signals. I am perfectly fine with a circuit that outputs $V_{OUT} = V_{IN}/\beta$ using a Gain Block (I found one on GitHub which works great). However, when we want to design a servo amplifier using a microcontroller we typically use the following circuit, which I understand is incorrect according to my textbook (I am not allowed to post pictures, but I hope someone at least knows the textbook circuit): My question is, why would we want to ignore and negate the input signal? Wouldn't it be easier to just not use the input signal? A: A servo amplifier has a sensing capability and this capability can be used to achieve movement. You would connect a potentiometer to the amplifier output. Then you measure the resistance between the terminals of the potentiometer. What will happen is that the output voltage of the amplifier will change depending on the position of the potentiometer. So if you have a 5 volts supply and a 12 volt supply (for example) you would scale the 12 volt supply to 5 volts for the output and both supplies to ground for the input. Your tracking servo could have its own power supply for this to work. Or you can measure the output voltage and determine the resistance. If you don't want a potentiometer then a variable resistor would work. Hope this helps A: e79caf774b
