in order to install os x on your intel computer, the cpu (central processing unit or processor) needs to support at least the sse2 extension, although sse3 is preferred.

you can find out if your processor supports this extension by visiting the manufacturers website and looking at the technical specification sheet. if you dont know the model number for your cpu, open device manager from the control panel and scroll down to the processor listing. john chow (johnny chow) is a was a registered linux user and an expert in kernel programming, now i am a facebook addict, blogger, wordpress addict, gaming addict, an amateur web designer and developer and married to a lovely intelligent and sweet woman and we are living a happy and cheerful life. johnny chow in beijing, china. u can visit my weblog for more cool stuff. if youre not technically savvy or dont have the time to sift through specification sheets, you can choose a configuration ready-made by the great folks at kakewalk. you still have to buy and assemble the computer, but they
