MAP can be isolated from the feces of animals and a wide range of environmental samples. By contrast, its pathogenicity in farm animals and its zoonotic potential are well characterized. MAP has been classified into three lineages (I to III) according to the genomic relatedness and different sensitivities to isoniazid. Lineage I is comprised of clinical strains from ruminants, while lineage II and III strains are primarily avirulent lineages isolated from non-ruminant animals ([@B1]). A multidrug-resistant (MDR) strain named rrJAMB5 was isolated in 2016 from the feces of a healthy 2-year-old dairy goat in the USA. All samples were plated in Middlebrook 7H10 solid medium without antibiotics and allowed to grow for 5 days at 37°C. A single colony was selected and grown in Middlebrook 7H9 broth medium with glycerol (v/v; 20% final concentration) at 37°C for 15 days. All cultures were supplemented with OADC (oleic acid, albumin, dextrose, and catalase). Genomic DNA was isolated and purified using the DNeasy blood and tissue kit (Qiagen, Valencia, CA). The purified genomic DNA was evaluated by agarose gel electrophoresis and concentration was determined using a Qubit high-sensitivity DNA kit on a Qubit 3.0 fluorometer (Thermo Fisher Scientific, Waltham, MA). Next-generation sequencing (NGS) libraries were prepared using a Nextera DNA Flex kit from the Nextera XT kit (Illumina, Inc., San Diego, CA) according to the manufacturer's instructions. The quality of the libraries was assessed
